Kant's Axe and my fear

I was walking home from the Kant's lecture about moral rules when I heard a strange noise behind me. I turned back and saw a person, who was running towards me with an axe. I was frozen stiff for a second, but a brilliant idea came to my mind - I could run to the Kant's house and hide there. So I started running. My only wish was to hide in the philosopher's house as soon as possible. Fortunately, his house was near, the door opened immediately and ^{so} ~~when~~ I got into a dark corridor I felt safe. ~~It's~~

It is no need to mention how awkward my meeting with Immanuel was. I tried to explain my risk to him and describe this awkward situation in general, but heard no positive response. Kant said that I made him break his imperative rules, ignore great philosophical ideas. I ^{1st} didn't understand a word, so Kant had to explain his opinion again.

I. Kant defined his behavior as not morally right, because if the murderer knocked at the door, asked ^{1st} where I was and the philosopher lied, then he would break the morality. If he told the truth, the murderer ^{2nd} would find and kill me, so Kant's behavior would be morally wrong, anyway.

I didn't know what to answer. Kant's wisdom impressed me greatly, so I decided to solve the problem by leaving his house. Luckily, the murderer vanished from the street into the air and I returned home safe. However, Kant's ideas turned my view on philosophy upside down. I decided not to listen ^{to} any philosophical ^{lectures} anymore.
