Writing

An Old Heart on Young Shoulders

That autumn was truly wonderful: trees were dressed in pure scarlet, the rustle of leaves was soothing me whenever I strolled along the alleys of our city, which were especially exquisite and welcoming that season.

As clichéd as it sounds, me and my best friend fell in love with each other, accidentally and unintentionally. It seemed to be a regular puppy love: frequenting little cafés ~~on~~ ⁱⁿ old autumn evenings, watching sunsets and naving all the coffee-and-TV routine unrolled into the blankets. I definitely felt comfortable and loved, but some ~~some~~ ^{my} thoughts were lurking in ~~my~~ ^{my} mind: "what if we give up on each other?"

I was speculating too much, considering my age, and that is why I enjoyed having conversations with her. I often listened to her pondering about existential love, the one where 'giving' is ~~is~~ ^{is} a just priority. The idea of being able to sacrifice yourself for another person's good became so ingrained in my mind that I sought any opportunity to do it.

One day she told me that we can't see each other anymore. Baffled and full of grief, I decided to let her go: that corresponded well to my perception of her, but what's more, I really trusted her. To say I was devastated would be putting it mildly, but she always erred on the side of caution, so I thought what I did was right.

Next day at school I saw her intently staring at me and then shrinking into the backyard. I followed her, and when we were close enough, she embraced me and murmured: "I have a severe mental problem. I think you can help me, but I don't want to hurt you." And this moment I realised we were made for each other.
