Museums: to Charge or not to Charge?

Nowadays, with ^{gr} formation of mass culture and rapid development of society, a lot of various museums have started to open their doors all over the world. All of them provide numerous amounts of valuable information to their visitors but quite ~~are~~ often it appears to be not free. Is this fair? This is the question I would like to speculate on to day.

As it was already ^{gr} mentioned, most of museums charge their visitors for entrance, which at first, may seem not fair, but, if you look better is necessary. First of all, all museums can be divided into two categories: state museums and private museums. The life of the private ones is maintained only by little number of enthusiasts, who have to charge their visitors, if they want their museum to develop and enlarge. This problem is ^{gr} occurred in state museums as well. Even though they do get financial support from the government, usually it is not enough and they have to make entrance charges too. For example, in my country most of the state museums charge their visitors and sometimes quite a lot, as they have a very large collection, which can not be properly maintained only on government financial support. The popularity of museums, which, unfortunately, degrades

In conclusion, I would like to say that from the ethical point of view all museums must be free to visit, as they contain valuable knowledge, which must be equally available to people of all ages and wealth, but, looking from material point of view, museums can't afford themselves to do this as it is necessary for their very existence.
