Museums: to change or not to change?

Museum is a remarkable place that has inspired a lot of people to learn something new or continue their studies. And even now, in a digital era, it has a huge impact on our culture and interest to history and science in general. So, it's important to invite people in such places but is it important for them to pay?

In the first place, I consider that every work shall be paid. Especially when it's a museum which contains items of past and present that have to be kept safe and clean. This requires a huge amount of money and this is what can explain why we need a payment to enter the museum.

On the other hand, most of the museums sponsored by a government, so it's strange to ask for a charge, because government's sponsorship has to be non-commercial. But if it's a private collection, then it's even more odd because if you possess that huge variety of items that only a museum could fit it, it means you're not a poor person and doing it only because you want to share a view with other people. If I remember correctly, even the biggest museum in Saint-Petersburg doesn't require a payment or it is really cheap. Personally, the only reason to pay for a ticket either to support rookie artists on their exhibitions or to see the best paintings of all times in the Ermitage.

All things considered, I can say that huge amount of museums shall be free to visit rather than require charge for admissions, because culture is something that everyone might freely access.
