Museums: to Charge or not to Charge?

Museums are one of the most popular places among tourists, kids in school and people interested in culture in general. Many consider them boring, but nearly everyone can find something that fascinates them - dinosaur bones, ancient Greek sculptures, things that people used in their day to day life centuries ago. Nothing could make a museum tour with a good guide, except for the price.

Turns out that many museums charge quite a lot for admission. In Russia, even with a discount a family ticket can cost about a thousand rubles - and that is for the Hermitage, one of the most popular art museums supported by the government! It will cost just as much for one person if you are visiting a contemporary art museum, and not everyone is willing to pay.

Although the prices are very disappointing for the visitors, museums need the money for a variety of reasons: paying the many people taking care of numerous exhibitions and paying for the exhibitions themselves: both modern and antique relics are sold for thousands of dollars on auctions. Not every museum has governmental funding, so they have to charge high prices in order to survive financially.

In my personal opinion, giving your money to support institutions of culture, such as museums, theaters and libraries, is noble, but very attractive for most people. If more museums lower the admission prices or make the entry free on some days, more people will start visiting them and therefore will make their first steps towards the world of culture.
