Writing

The Secret History +

The book that captured my attention recently is "The Secret History" written by Donna Tartt, the famous author of "The Goldfinch". The plot revolves around an elite group of students that get involved in the murder of one of their colleagues.

A high-school graduate Richard Papen chooses classical literature as his major in a small English college. He notices that a number of students are attending some kind of closed classes on Ancient Greek, makes a deal with the professor and gets his way into the classroom. This secret society, consisting of five students and their mentor, has a fallout with one of the members - a young man named Bunny. To get their revenge, students begin to plot Bunny's murder.

The most crucial problems that this novel presents to the filmmaker are its volume and the cultural barrier. Firstly, the book consists of more than 600 pages, and it would be a challenge to fit all of this information in a 2-hour movie. Secondly, a lot of the underlying context in this novel is based on Greek mythology and classical literature, and understanding it could be hard for an unprepared audience. On the contrary, finding a cast of actors for the movie certainly won't be an issue - most of the main characters are portrayed as young, wealthy European people.

All in all, I believe that watching a movie based on this book would be a wonderful experience. A college murder mystery with charismatic characters would be very appealing to the young adult audience, and, despite the challenges, this movie would surely become popular.
