Writing

Ever since I was a little girl, my father has always ^{gr.} praised America. It's a dream of mine to enroll in an Ivy League school and study in "the land of opportunity" as my dad would nickname the USA.

When I started learning English, I had fallen in love with the language. For me, speech in English flows like water from the tip of my tongue and smoothly rolls off the ballpoint of my pen. It brings me joy when I expand my vocabulary and find new words to express myself with. As an extrovert, I value the opportunity to communicate with people through English.

What really helped me out was communication. It's a part of human nature to desire connection, and the elation of successfully transmitting a thought to someone previously off-limits is unparalleled. Breaking through the language barrier is liberating, and the liberation can be used as fuel for further learning the language. It can start with the small things — answering the simple questions of the cashier at the grocery store, asking about the weather or what day of the week it is along with other forms of small talk. If you don't have the chance to talk with native speakers, I recommend reading books.
